LOS ALTOS, Calif. — Two freelance journalists have been awarded the 2022 American Mosaic Journalism Prize for their work reporting on underrepresented or misrepresented groups in the United States. (Linda A. Jones/Heising-Simons Foundation via AP)

Julian Brave NoiseCat and Ryan Christopher Jones were each awarded $100,000 by the Heising-Simons Foundation based in Los Altos, California.

His articles and podcasts have covered issues such as fatherhood from the perspective of Indigenous men and a movement by homeless Black mothers to reclaim a vacant house they were evicted from in West Oakland, California, the foundation said.

Jones is a Mexican American photojournalist and anthropologist. His work has examined the imperialist histories of Latin America and its legacies of colonialism and race.

"Heising-Simons is thrilled to support these journalists as they bring to light the diverse stories of vulnerable, often marginalized communities," said Christian Heising, president of the foundation.
